Middle East Modern Art Space [1]

PROJECT BRIEF

Salameh Neimat, an artist, art collector and a journalist, first conceived the idea of creating a contemporary art center and a gallery space to feature contemporary Jordanian and Middle Eastern Art. Set in his privately owned olive grove, we wanted to make a building with minimal foot print, so the building hovers above the land.

Grappling with the desire to make a building that flies in a horizontal cantilever of about 20 meter, and the structural challenge this holds, we wanted a piece of architecture that hovers above the olive grove. It was intended to see the unblocked view of the flat olive grove upon arrival, and walk by a sculpture garden.

The building would not occupy the site but would rather fly above it. It is designed to become a metaphor for rock strata that erodes with time. From one end, the building erodes and dissolves in space, creating an intricate natural break point which suggests the building's being in a continuous state of breakage, a never-ending breaking process.

Recycled stone was used for the façades to minimize the cost while also preserving the naturally induced randomness a recycled material gives you. Recycled materials force you to accept certain qualities from its formation process. This quality has its importance which cannot be obtained from purpose-cut stone, and this adds to the architecture of the place.

AREA	LOCATION	DATE	CLIENT
	New Badr, Amman, Jordan	2012	Mr. Salameh Neimat

Copyright (c) 2013 Khammash Architects. All rights reserved.

Source URL: https://www.khammash.com/projects/middle-east-modern-art-space

Links
[1] https://www.khammash.com/projects/middle-east-modern-art-space